

BREAD DOUGH, FRESH FROM PARIS BAKERIES

OCTOBER 7, 2013

I have been in France six years now and I feel that I'm now getting to grips with the country. I have figured out the school system, the tax system and the obsession with dossiers. So now, I am always thrilled when I discover something new! This weekend, it was the fact that you can walk into almost any French bakery (and there are many) and ask for baguette dough, already bashed around and risen to perfection. It costs the same as a loaf of bread and the possibilities are endless.

I made a couple of trays full of fresh pizza and some foccacia with the leftovers as we had friends over for dinner. I think it would be lovely to pick up the dough one night and then bake some little rolls for breakfast. Someone told me that you can even buy brioche dough, which you can then roll out, fill and experiment with. Voila, you learn something new every day!

I am wondering, can you do the same in other countries?

- Emilie

Category: Cultural, Food, Food Items, Take-Away

---

EMILIE IN PARIS | 17 COMMENTS